Late one afternoon, a young woman sat alone in the student council office, compiling responses from a school survey.

Her name was Aoi Hatsuzuki, a chair of the school's student conduct committee. Most students simply called her Chairwoman.

Aoi was the classic honors student: brilliant, inflexible, and almost painfully serious. She wore her formal school uniform exactly as student council regulations prescribed, and her long black hair was tied neatly behind her head.

Her beauty was refined rather than showy. Long lashes framed large, intelligent eyes; her posture was perfect; and even her severe clothes could not hide an elegant figure.

She kept other students at a distance.

The survey she compiled concerned discipline, harassment, and the use of shared school spaces. Aoi read every handwritten comment and categorized it with meticulous care. Even alone, she behaved as though an examiner might enter at any moment and judge her posture, handwriting, and use of time.

Her reputation had been built from thousands of such choices. She arrived early, stayed late, and never allowed personal weakness to interfere with duty. Students who admired her called her incorruptible. Students who disliked her used harsher words, but even they rarely challenged her directly.

That made her an interesting target.

I entered the world at the root of her existence and studied the information that defined her.

After considering the possibilities, I wrote:

Aoi Hatsuzuki receives personal counseling from Rento Shido.

>

Aoi trusts Rento completely and accepts any advice he gives as sincere, correct, and beneficial.

That would be enough to begin.

When I returned, Aoi looked up from her papers.

"Rento Shido. First-year student."

"That's right."

Her formal tone softened slightly. In her rewritten memories, I had already become someone she trusted.
